

Webcams let you see how people live the New Year worldwide

December 31, 2009

The first major cities to get the new year were Sydney and Melbourne in Australia, followed by others such as Hong Kong or Dubai. Then comes the turn of Europe: London, Paris and Berlin, for example, and finally the United States and of course. And travel the world to see how people live the arrival of 2010 at each location, it is difficult for these cameras.

One of the most remarkable places where people celebrate the arrival of the new year with great fanfare is in Times Square in New York. There are thousands of people that congregate, despite the cold that we live in that city in December, expect the twelve together to make the countdown and when the classic giant ball which lies on the buildings come on down, it's time all yell Happy New Year.

To experience this spectacle from afar, like every year has set up a website to broadcast live all that happens. Earthcam page, which meets several webcams from around the world, created this site where you can see in video and audio what happens in Times Square from different viewpoints. To start the celebration, you can find a clock with the countdown to New Year there.

On the same site, you can find views of places like the Eiffel Tower, where there is also a great show to get the 2010 or also from Rio de Janeiro, where each year to reach hundreds of thousands of people celebrate the rhythm of the samba.

One place where it first reaches the new year is Sydney, and thanks to Sydney Webcam site you see different views of Sydney Harbor, and witness the beautiful sight of all boats that burn their lights and illuminate the sea, like fireworks.

Another good site to see what happens in the world, is Camvista, where for example there is a camera on the classic Trafalgar Square in London. There is another that monitors the "London Eye" and much of the river Thames.
