All the world waits to see the wrath that Hurricane Sandy and the corresponding storm will unleash on New York City over the course of Monday, October 29, 2012. While news reports are not difficult to find, there is a live cam available online that provides the sights and sounds from the torch of the Statue of Liberty. It is a real live view, down to the rain drops on the screen. Tonight you can hear the wind whipping around Lady Liberty's head!

New York City, along with the nearby New Jersey shore, are poised to take a bombardment from a storm being heralded as, "The Perfect Storm." If predictions are correct, this storm and the surge it produces could bring a level of devastation not seen before in New York or anywhere else in New England.

The Statue of Liberty Cams from Earth Cam allows a view from Lady Liberty's torch where the public has been forbidden access since 1916. There are other views available on this same webpage, such as the view of the Statue of Liberty from Brooklyn. This site is an interesting and educational bookmark to have on the computer whether there is a storm or not.

As the center of the storm approaches New York City, this view should be very interesting.
